

I think culinary connect is good, but when I first heard it I thought it might've been an app for culinary students.

1 response

I think it might be a little long (6 syllables). It seems like 2-3 is the way to go (think of major social media sites).

1 response

Sounds fire, maybe Culinary Connects like it's a connection that you can make through recipes. Just sounds better plural in my opinion

1 response

It makes sense and fits the concept, I also like the alliteration. However, whenever I see the word "connect" in a platform I'm like ugh 😞. Not sure why, maybe it just feels overused and corporatey. Maybe the title should focus more on the aspect of recipes and cooking, "connect" makes it feel like social media or something. Only note. Jk actually, seems like the draw that makes this different is the interaction aspect. Solid name. No notes.

1 response

Culinary is very clear as to what the app is about, but connect leaves me to wonder if I am connecting to a group that loves cooking, a website with cooking groups but this may be due to my age.

1 response

The name does not "grab" me. Also, the app does 3 things, "discover/share/connect over food". Google this as an app. Then Google "Culinary Connect" and you get Job Databases. I would have to put more thought into this.

1 response

I feel it is a good idea that seems promising as far as providing ideas to make based on ingredients you have, and your individual preferences, particularly as someone who would be an average cook. I just feel the name culinary adds an elevated feel that might make the average cook feel that it may be too fancy for them.

1 response